Play Framework 2.6 version also supports encrypted cookies. But how does it do that? Action Cookies Play 2.6 used Action Cookies in this way. Play uses Action Cookies to add values to the session before an action is rendered. Action Cookies are separate and distinct from session values and are meant to store values that do not get updated by a request. In the above example, suppose that the user is not logged in when he/she submits the forms. So when the action is invoked, the value is fetched from the Action cookie. Controller Cookies Play 2.6 also uses Controller Cookies in this way. Play uses Controller Cookies to add values to the session before a controller is rendered. Like Action Cookies, Controller Cookies are separate and distinct from session values and are meant to store values that do not get updated by a request. Login Controller If you would like to restrict specific actions only to logged in users, you can use Form tag for the same purpose. Using the Auth object available in the Controller If you would like to store some values in your Sessions, you can do it using the value stored in the auth object. To get the auth object in your controllers, you should use the Auth object. Play 2.6 version also provides basic authentication with OAuth. Let's see how to implement OAuth in f678ea9f9e
